In December 2014 an exhibit on the archaeological excavations at Tell Mozan opened in Qamishli, and then moved to other towns in the vicinity - an extraordinary initiative in an area surrounded by conflict and iconoclasm.

The initiative for this exhibit came from the Subartu Cultural Association and the regional director the Department of Antiquities and Museums, Dr. Suleiman.

The material for the exhibit focuses on the results of a quarter century of excavation and research at the site of Tell Mozan, the ancient city of Urkesh.

Exhibit produced by:

The Subartu Cultural Association
The Mozan / Urkesh Archaeological Project
The Audience
Attending the exhibits were members of the community, local media as well as families with children.

Families brought children, here viewing the photo installation.

Visitors from Qamishli viewing the exhibit.

Local media were present, publicizing the event’s opening.

The Venues
Qamishli is the second largest city in the Hassake region, in the north-eastern corner of Syria, sharing a border with Turkey and Iraq.

The exhibit began in Qamishli, in a space used for cultural exhibits. The Subartu Cultural Association planned for the exhibit to move to other cultural centers in the region. Not all of these destinations could be reached for security reasons, but the Exhibit was shown in the Nowruz Hall in Amuda, the closest municipality to Tell Mozan.

Amuda is a small town a few kilometers from Tell Mozan. Many of our workmen come from here, and our ties to the community are strong.

Our commitment
Members of the local community who are proud of the cultural heritage.

Excavations at Tell Mozan had to stop after 2010 because of the ongoing crisis, but our commitment to the project remains. We are in constant contact with people at and around the site, and we are pound to continue to support them as well as syrian students pursuing degrees in archaeology abroad.

Students from the community involved in the exhibit installation - teaching the next generation of stakeholders even in times of crisis.
